

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

INDIE NOVELIST MEETS INDIE EDITOR Wanda Shapiro Interviews Andy Hunter of Electric Literature

LOS ANGELES, California (March 8, 2010) – Wanda Shapiro, author of Sometimes That Happens With Chicken: A Novel, recently posted a blog interview with Andy Hunter, co-founder/co-editor of Electric Literature. Hunter answered questions regarding his own success and shared some thoughts on literature and the publishing industry.

As described on their website (<http://www.electricleadership.com>), “Electric Literature’s mission is to use new media and innovative distribution to return the short story to a place of prominence in popular culture. [They] are a quarterly anthology of five top-notch short stories, delivered in every viable medium.”

Being as Hunter and his co-founder Scott Lindenbaum are leveraging some of the same technologies as Shapiro, she has been following Electric Literature and the press they have been getting since their first issue in June of 2009. She admits on her website to a case of hero worship and was honored when Hunter agreed to an interview.

Use the link below to read the entire interview on One Girl One Novel: The Blog.

<http://www.onegirlonenovel.com/index.php/2010/03/interview-with-electric-literature/>

Shapiro hopes her independent business model applied to the novel will be as successful as Hunter and Lindenbaum’s independent new literary magazine. Having recently launched her website, Shapiro is following in the indie tradition and bringing her debut novel directly to readers. She is offering a free download of Sometimes That Happens With Chicken on her website and the paperback edition will be available later this month.

For more information, visit <http://www.onegirlonenovel.com> where you can learn all about the girl, the novel, the plan, and how you can help.

###